Dog Memorials

Only a man who owns a dog can define what special bond of companionship brings between human and canine. This is why when a dog becomes deceased, it could be as traumatic as losing a relative. The pet owner who experiences this special bond understands well why dog memorials are not really a wild idea. We sometimes have to have a memorial to aid us process the grief, and sometimes it just helps us to say goodbye, to say thanks somehow for the years of joy our friend brought us.

As we are all different, we have got different opinion of our memorials. Many people could well be fine having a simple backyard ceremony with few words; other, perhaps would like something more intricate like cremation, dispersing cremains on a place of sentimental value. For some individuals, one would be alright having a favorite photo framed or a memory box filled with stuffs. Some would go for putting a few fur or a pinch of their pet's cremains in a sealed locket. And yet, for a lot of, none of such dog memorials works, since they only be reminders of what is lost. Something that would remind them about the happiness of a life well-lived or something that would help cope their feelings.

This is why some people are choosing another option-to add the remains of their special friend in an inspirational thing of beauty. One designer specifically has created an art series just for this purpose: the Loving Hearts Tribute Series. Every print the artist makes is a limited edition; she paints heart-themed original painting and creates 100 max giclee print of each one. Each time a dog owner selects one of these prints, the artist then hand-finishes the artwork with a final coat containing the fur or ashes of the deceased animal. Each finished print is done on gallery-wrap canvas which is entirely suited to display.

In a manner of speaking, the dog becomes part of something wonderful and uplifting; something can keep the happiness and hope flowing to its lifespan and something that will help you cope. In wonderful manner, these heart-themed artworks bring a meaningful tribute.

Nothing brings back your favorite friend, though the good feelings and joyful memories may be preserved for a lifetime with a work of art similar to this. Some individuals might not need a tribute of this magnitude, however for others, nothing less will do. The most fitting dog memorials could be the Loving Hearts Tribute Series.
