Dogs benefit the most from consistent training and rewards. The key is to establish a baseline of good behavior, and then reinforce it by rewarding subsequent displays by the dog. This is how you teach dog tricks. Repetition with rewards is the best way to properly train a dog.

Dogs are capable of knowing the right and the wrong thing to do with proper and consistent training. Even your house dog can enforce these strict rules. It can quickly undermine your efforts.

When teaching your dog not to chew on things that are not toys, you should try to facilitate success. In addition, keep household objects that could be dangerous away from your pet. Keep all items within the dog's reach, like hair accessories or office supplies, away from your dog's reach.

When you begin training your dog, you should be aware of what his favorite foods are. Knowing the right food to give as a reward will get your dog to work harder in his training. Try a variety of treats and pay close attention to your pet's responses to narrow in on his favorite.

Dog training is most productive when you know what incentives that your dog will work for. Dog training is a learning experience, and it's important to determine what motivates your pet. It doesn't matter the reason you want to train your dog, you need to offer a variety of exercises along with positive reinforcement. The happier your dog is, the better he will perform for you.

Playing tug-of-war with your puppy makes training more effective. This encourages puppies to bite. On the other hand, your puppy will be older and well-trained, you can play rough games.

To ensure your training sticks, you need to be consistent in your household and to treat your dog the same way you do and use the same training methods. Consistency is important in your training method, and dogs respond best when their training is consistent. If a dog is treated differently by different trainers, he will become confused and unsure of the correct behaviors.

Consistency is the key to dog training. Make a list of the commands that you are teaching your dog, and be sure that you are consistent in your household with them. Discuss with family members what methods to employ in encouraging good behavior by your dog. If you are consistent in your training, the dog will be able to understand what is expected of him.

One of the ways to make dog training easy to train is to have the dog fixed for a few months. This would be done at the same time you start obedience training. The dog will perform better in obedience training if he is neutered or spayed. Your dog will be a better companion and his training will lead to a better life for the animal.

Don't overdo your training sessions, keep them brief and interesting for better results. Your dog will get bored during the training and over. Keep the lessons down to about 10 minutes or so.

Try using a clicker to help reinforce good behavior. All you should do is create an association between a good thing and the fun noise of the clicker. Use the clicker and give your dog a treat immediately every few times a day. Soon enough, your dog will recognize that the noise means "great," turning the clicker into a useful tool for shaping desirable behavior.

You do not want to over-stress your new pup by trying to teach him too much too quickly. A puppy has a short attention span and limited energy to focus, so keep your sessions brief and positive if possible. If you do try to teach the puppy what he will forget what you have taught him, and remember that in a negative way, it will be harder to help him in the end.

Giving your dog mental stimulation is an important part of keeping your pet happy and healthy. Among them are the best things for your dog are plenty of strolls in the neighborhood, chew toys and rawhide bones. Without the right type of stimulation, dogs suffer from boredom and turn to destructive behaviors, such as destroying household furnishings.
